

The Center for Research Security & Integrity (CRSI) is pleased to offer a 1-day research security workshop to help institutions better safeguard the security and integrity of research. This unique course focuses on how to conduct due diligence and assess risks associated with research engagements (formal or informal) with the People's Republic of China.

Workshop Features

- Provides details on China's programs, methods, and supporting infrastructures used to legally or illegally influence, acquire, or transfer technology / know-how that pose risks to German research institutions and their funders
- Offers a primer and case studies on risks posed by PRC talent programs, focusing on lesser-known aspects that have received insufficient scrutiny
- Explains how to identify and assess national and economic security, ethical, and transparency / integrity risks that go beyond criminal activity or regulatory violations (such as export controls)
- Includes case examples taken from actual foreign influence investigations - details that governments do not typically share with the public
- Offers demonstrations and exercises on using data tools and other information sources for conducting due diligence, including techniques to exploit both English and Mandarin information without requiring Mandarin proficiency
- Includes a handbook (softcopy) with additional information on policies and programs like the China Scholarship Council; lists of PRC entities posing national security risks; additional case examples; instructions on using select data tools; and links to reading materials and resources

Who Benefits from this Workshop?

- Government officials responsible for allocation and oversight of research funding
- Research institution administrators in international affairs offices; compliance or research security officers; other relevant personnel responsible for partnerships and exchanges with China
- Science managers and interested faculty that oversee or participate in collaborations with China and are required to conduct basic due diligence
